This entanglement of the two worlds, which the bishops sought to keep separate, was shattered by the Second Vatican Council. The Council, which was held in 1962-1965, was a landmark event in the history of the Catholic Church. It was the first time since the Second Council of Nicaea in 325 that a general council of the entire Church had been convened. The Council's decisions were far-reaching and controversial. It declared that the Church was not infallible, that the Pope was not the head of the Church, and that the Church was not the only path to salvation. It also declared that the Church was not a political entity and that it should not interfere in politics. These decisions were a direct challenge to the traditional teachings of the Church and to the authority of the Pope. The Council's decisions were met with resistance from many bishops and theologians. Some of them argued that the Council's decisions were a betrayal of the Church's tradition and that they were a dangerous step towards secularism. However, the Council's decisions were eventually accepted by the vast majority of the Church's members. The Council's decisions have had a profound impact on the Church's relationship with the world. It has led to a more open and dialogical Church, one that is more willing to engage with the challenges of the modern world. It has also led to a more diverse and pluralistic Church, one that recognizes the value of different cultures and traditions. The Council's decisions have also led to a more democratic Church, one that is more willing to listen to the voices of its members. The Council's decisions have been a source of both controversy and renewal for the Catholic Church. They have challenged the Church's traditional teachings and authority, but they have also opened up new possibilities for the Church's future. The Council's decisions have been a landmark event in the history of the Catholic Church, and they continue to shape the Church's relationship with the world today.
